Johnson, Kenneth. Slavic Sorcery. St. Paul: Llewellyn, 1998. Take this book with a grain of salt. While it has some marvelous information about Slavic spirituality, the author makes no distinction between Ukrainian and Russian beliefs and practices. As well, some of the spiritual exercises may not be of Slavic origin at all, but rather an amalgamation of Far Eastern with "New Age." As you know, Baba prefers Old Age.

Wilson, Josh. "Maslenitsa, Blini!: The Food and Celebrations of the Russians." Abstract: School of Russian and Asian Studies (Woodside). September 3, 2005. www.sras.org. While this author is correct about the Russian term "blini," he incorrectly attributes the winter holiday of Maslenyitsa to Russia. It is firmly of Ukrainian origin.

Winter, Sarah K. I. "Moist Mother Earth." www.winterscapes.com. A directory of Slavic gods and goddesses. I checked this information against many other sources. Some was dead on, some dubious or neopagan fanciful. However, it was a good springboard for organizing research into the Slavic pantheon.

en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Cucuteni-Trypillian_culture I would appreciate knowing who wrote this excellent article about the largest settlements in Neolithic Europe, shared by Ukraine, Romania and Moldova. The Cucetini or Trypillian culture existed from 5100 to 2750 BC. Please ignore the superfluous references to Russian names, they are irrelevant. Please otherwise be very careful about trusting Wiki, as Ukrainian scholars are being suspended for correcting Russian propaganda, prolific throughout this dubious resource.
